The first thing that I noticed when I stepped out of the train was the humidity. It was sticky, heavy, and it clung to my skin. I had heard that the weather in the South was unbearable, but I didn't realize just how true that was. The heat was oppressive, and it made me feel like I was being baked alive.

I had been told that the humidity was the worst part of the experience, but I didn't know it would be so intense. It wasn't just the heat; it was the way it felt. It was like a giant hand was pressing down on me, making it difficult to breathe. I had never experienced anything like this before, and it was a real shock to the system.

The humidity was a constant reminder of the South's climate. It was everywhere, and it was always there. Even when I went to the beach, the humidity followed me. The ocean breeze was a relief, but it was only a temporary escape from the heat. As soon as I stepped back onto the shore, the humidity was back, and it was just as oppressive.

I had heard that the humidity was a curse, but I didn't know it would be so much more than just a nuisance. It was a real challenge, and it was something that I had to learn to live with. It was a lesson in patience and endurance, and it was a lesson that I would never forget.
