In 2000, there were 1.3 billion people aged 65 and over. This increase is due to a number of factors, including improvements in medical care, better nutrition, and a decline in infant mortality.

The increase in the number of people in the world has a number of implications. One of the main implications is the increase in the number of people who are dependent on others. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion people aged 65 and over. In 2000, there were 1.3 billion people aged 65 and over. This increase in the number of people who are dependent on others has a number of implications, including the need for more social services and the need for more people to work to support the dependent population.

In 1990, there were 3.5 billion people aged 15 years and over. In 2000, there were 4.5 billion people aged 15 years and over. This increase in the number of people who are in the workforce has a number of implications, including the need for more jobs and the need for more people to be trained for the workforce.

The increase in the number of people in the world has a number of other implications as well. For example, it has led to an increase in the number of people who are living in poverty. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion people living in poverty. In 2000, there were 1.3 billion people living in poverty. This increase in the number of people who are living in poverty has a number of implications, including the need for more social services and the need for more people to be trained for the workforce.

The increase in the number of people in the world has a number of other implications as well. For example, it has led to an increase in the number of people who are living in crowded conditions. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion people living in crowded conditions. In 2000, there were 1.3 billion people living in crowded conditions. This increase in the number of people who are living in crowded conditions has a number of implications, including the need for more social services and the need for more people to be trained for the workforce.

The increase in the number of people in the world has a number of other implications as well. For example, it has led to an increase in the number of people who are living in poor health. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion people living in poor health. In 2000, there were 1.3 billion people living in poor health. This increase in the number of people who are living in poor housing has a number of implications, including the need for more social services and the need for more people to be trained for the workforce.
